The defense of Tilton by Lieut.-Col. Sampson M. Archer with his regiment (the 17th Iowa), against an overwhelming the following communication was delivered to Col. Johnson: force of infantry and artillery was per-formed with great gallautry and fortitude In my original orders to Col. Wever, commanding the brigade, I directed him to call to Resaca all of the 17th Iowa at Tilton, except 70 men to defend the blockhouse, but upon the advice of Gen. Smith to leave the whole of the force there and have them make a strong defense if attacked and hald the strong defense in a strong defense of the contraction. tacked, and hold the enemy as long as possible this force was allowed to remain.

This was the standing orders of every post on the railroad, to defend it to the last extremity. Col. Archer had 290 muskets at his command. In his report of the action he says: of the action he says:

A second demand for surrender was made and refused. This is what Col. Johnson says followed his second refusal to surrender: was maintained on both sides for four hours, during which time the rebels gained no ground, and were punished considerably, while my loss was but three or four men from chance shots, into the ditch or through loopholes.

Sharpshooting was lating myself that the enemy, having no artillery at hand, would soon abandon the place, knowing that charging would result disastrously to them, when a cannon-ball passed over the house, and it was discovered that three guns were in position on the crest of the hill, distant about 275 or 300 vards southwest of us. Twenty-one shots were fired from these guns (12-pounder howitzers) at intervals of about two minutes, doing no further injury to us than a few slight wounds, a part of the
